Anna lived a life full of quiet strength and courage in her battle with cancer. In keeping with her compassionate spirit, Anna made the extraordinary decision to donate her body to the Humanities Gift Registry. We were advised that it has been accepted for a vital research study at Temple University in Philadelphia where she was taken on Friday, October 3. Her contribution will support groundbreaking research over the next 2.5 years, helping others in ways that reflect her lifelong desire to give back.

Following the completion of the study, Anna's ashes will be returned and laid to rest at Oaklands Cemetery in West Chester, PA beside her beloved husband Bob.

In accordance with Anna's wishes, she requested that there be no funeral services. Instead, she asked that donation of a specified amount be made on her behalf to the American Cancer Society. She also asked that donations be made in her honor to the American Cancer Society to continue her legacy of hope and healing.

“ Anne was a person who gave and gave. and gave to others. She was always finding ways to take care of people, whether it was a young organist or a friend in need of a listening ear, or a person ill and unable to take care of necessary tasks. Anne was wonderfully kind to my mother and to our children and she took a special interest in our grandson who has special needs. She was a really wonderful spouse to Bob, taking care of him to the end, no matter how difficult things were. That was her top priority in the last few years, and she was relieved to have been able to care for him until his final breath.

As a part of caring for people, Anne was also a person who would tell one the unvarnished truth as she saw it, no matter the circumstances. She was a person of great integrity and a person of great loyalty.

Anne was a bright and resourceful person. She knew how to do many things, including making wonderful things happen for people and organizations that she believed in. It is no surprise that even after death she has found a way to benefit others by donating her body for research.

She had a beautiful spirit, and we will always remember her kindness
